Your plants' moods

Happy. Nothing to do here. Great job!

Thirsty. Manually water your plant or click on the water icon on your start menu. You may need to top up your water-bucket too.

Sick: You've watered your plant too much or dangerous bacteria are in your plants' soil. Act fast!

Vampire: Exposure to light was not sufficient.

Cold: Your plant needs some warmer environment in order to survive.

Hot: Your plant needs some colder environment in order to survive.

Everything you need to know about sunlight

You may have heard the terms “bright light” and “low light” plants, but what does that really mean?

“Bright light” or “full sun” means there is no barrier (curtains or blinds, a tall tree or building that creates shade) between the plant and the light source (a sunny window). This is where your plant will receive the most bright or direct light while indoors. Aloes, succulents and palm trees are sun worshipping plants. They should get direct sun for at least 6 hours a day. Generally speaking, you would want to put them the brightest spot in the room. “Medium light” or “filtered sunlight” is light that’s been diffused (sheer curtains) between the plant and the light source (a sunny window) Some refer to it as “dappled sunlight”.

Anything partially obstructing the path between your plant and the lightsource creates this medium light. Want to know how much light your plant is getting? A shadow test should do the trick. Take a sheet of paper and hold it up to the light source when the sun is high around midday. Take your free hand and place it a foot or so above your piece of paper. A sharp shadow indicates bright light while a softer shadow indicates medium light. If your plant is a few feet away from a window, even a sunny window, your plant is surviving in low light.
